Competency-based medical education (CBME) challenges educators and institutions to embed observation and feedback into their everyday approaches to teaching and learning. But in medical training, direct observation of learners remains inconsistent, and feedback too often proves suboptimal. In this talk, the reasons for these problems will be critically examined, including the role of medicine’s learning culture.